

You could scrub pterodactyl poop
from your windshield.

Or you could ride in Critical Mass.

Less time for your car and more time for you.

Just think of all the time you devote to your car: waiting in traffic, finding a parking space, making repairs, and cleaning. Especially cleaning. Why, you must spend at least 5 hours a week scraping pterodactyl poop from your car's windshield. Don't you have better (and better smelling) things to do with your time? Like gardening, playing with your children or riding your bicycle? Well, maybe some day you can join your friends at Critical Mass instead of cleaning up the waste of flying lizards. And why should you join us? Because we have fun and prehistoric animals haven't defecated on us in years.

Special note to motorists: We just want to share the road with you, and we appreciate your patience if you're behind us. It won't kill you to wait the extra minute (or less) until you get to the next intersection, where you can turn and no longer be behind us. Honest, it won't even hurt. Thanks for your patience.

Brought to you by Critical Mass

The last working Friday of every month

5:30ish at the Gallivan Center
<http://www.slccriticalmass.org>